Determine the mechanisms of speech recovery from a single case of severe acquired brain injury. An adult deaf patient's brain injury resulted in progressive visual and verbal speech difficulties that eventually resolved after several years. The patient's speech disorder was characterized by abnormal syllable duration, apraxia of speech, and reduced oral and written word retrieval. In written tests, she produced typographical errors and phonological errors, especially when some of the phonemes were altered in a difficult-to-recognize manner. To perform the phonological errors, the patient utilized articulatory strategies such as assimilation, extension, and reduplication. Articulatory analysis of the patient's speech revealed a phonological system that was reorganized and reorganized over time with the articulatory processes of consonant devoicing and fricative blending. The patient's brain injury was associated with reorganization of the language and articulatory processes that were reflected in her unique patterns of phonological errors, but her speech was eventually restored.
