Q: Does Math.random() have a reference? That was tricky question to answer.. So I have a variable called var that is defined as var = Math.random(); var2 = var; var = Math.random() is referenced (a few times...) inside of a function and all of them has a different value. Does Math.random() has a reference or it is a global variable? A: Yes, var2 refers to the same object as var. var2 is a reference to the object contained in the variable var.

Q: PowerShell and Combine Behaviors I have a PowerShell script that is throwing a Syntax Error when I attempt to run it. I'm really quite stumped as to why. The script works for certain sets of data but not another. I was told it might have something to do with a command failing (I was told this as I've tried to install IIS Manager Powershell 4.0 on my server and the error was gone). Here's

It looks like it could fit our needs, and its in a good location, several shops within walking distance. Only it is looking pretty expensive, both for the monthly payments (couple of grand) and the renovation cost (same amount). That said, we are looking for a better deal, so we are trying to find a sub-$1k per month apartment. We are also looking into renting out our place while doing our work on a bigger place. Regardless of these plans, I always look at how close the place is to Metro. This is because I hate long commutes, and would be happy to do it if its not too far away. I also hate that they will ask for 100% of my first month's rent, even if they are just using it as a temporary space while I work out the move. They will ask for at least 200 of the first month's rent (60th of the month). So how much is 100? Subtract 100% of the (monthly) rent? It is at least 50, much less than 100. So when you do the rent + move-in fees alone, it is already 60 of the rent.
