The "HyperMotion Technology" was created by German company Mind Sports, which specializes in motion capture and computer vision research. Mind Sports is the creator of the "Headnod" and the "Headnod Elite" motion capture technology and systems. Mind Sports matches real-life player performance data against simulated player animations, to assess the impact of different variables like player speed and movement, player roles, player density and more. A video demonstration of the new "HyperMotion Technology" was released on April 9, 2016, as part of a YouTube series titled "FIFA 2016 FanTests". It showed real-life players running through an air blast created by Mind Sports to demonstrate how the new "HyperMotion Technology" affects simulation. The video demonstrated the inclusion of freely-flowing and dynamic Player 2 animations, including different player movement and sprinting speeds. It also showed how the system highlights certain player roles and the player density within a game. A "hyper-blaster" which moves along a set path can be set for free-run, or the player can be set to run to a specific position, where it blows a circle around and beyond the player. A further video showed how the new artificial intelligence systems receive and analyse game events, and where the systems can be set to trigger player responses, for example, to an opponent taking a shot. The "HyperMotion Technology" does not only look at player positions and movement, but also looks at player roles and team tactics. Player roles such as up-field runners, full-backs and strikers also affect the way players are deployed and animated. "The 'HyperMotion Technology' allows us to perfectly set the pace of gameplay for all 22 real-life players and all 82 licensed teams," said David Rutter, FIFA Technical Director. "This gives us the biggest challenge with the game yet: to make sure that the fast and fluid gameplay of 'HyperMotion Technology' is enjoyed by all football fans. Players need to be careful to ensure that the pace of their runs and passes is the same for all on-screen players. Fans of other sports might not be used to the pace of Premier League football, but FIFA Football will always have a thrilling pace." The new "HyperMotion Technology" allows for more realistic Player 2 animations. The previous "FIFA 15" system could only simulate a very limited range
