"If you're going to create a completely new gameplay experience, you need to develop the next generation of technologies that will be able to deliver a new level of realism," said Brian McNeal, producer at EA SPORTS, the creators of FIFA. "We've taken the lessons from those technologies and are implementing them across the game. The result is a new type of football that brings to life the emotion and excitement of the real thing." Using state-of-the-art motion capture techniques and in-game physics, the FIFA "HyperMotion" gameplay engine captures all of the player's movements on the pitch, from running speed to jumping distance and tackles. Combined with an all-new physics and energy system, this engine allows players to experience a whole new set of in-game challenges. When you are playing a game of FIFA '22, when you hit the B button, you can choose to switch between two command passes: a long one that is designed to go into space for a one-touch pass, and a short one that goes direct to your teammate. By default, your cursor will be the middle of the pitch to choose your path. On the other hand, pressing C will allow you to control the ball using the D-pad in the bottom corner of the screen. For off-ball movements, you can use B or C and either move forwards or backwards, while pressing A will switch between the left and right analog sticks and use the face buttons for manual movement.
