U.S. Pat. No. 4,603,678 and U.S. Pat. No. 4,884,068 disclose a pressure nozzle which has a transverse passage. The lower end of the passage is connected to a water supply line, and the lower end of the passage is encased in a plastic water-sealing plug. A nozzle is enclosed by a housing of a plastic material and is provided with an upper end that can be extended into the passage. The nozzle slides in longitudinal direction and can be moved in opposite directions within the passage. The housing has a rounded lower end that can be pushed inwards and can be deformed by hand so that the nozzle is deformed against the inner wall of the passage and the seal is broken. Such a nozzle is not suitable for incorporating bottles of various sizes. Local structure of chromatin in nuclei of human tumor cells and its relation to malignancy and chemotherapy. In tissue samples of cancer patients, nuclei of malignant and reactive cells often contain numerous fixed chromocenters that include condensed heterochromatin. As a result, the nuclei appear darkly stained. In biopsy samples, the staining is useful for the identification of malignant cells in specimens containing large numbers of nonmalignant cells. The staining is also useful for identifying infiltrating malignant cells in aspirates of bronchial mucosa. With the development of DNA-staining techniques and the increasing use of chromatin electrophoresis in clinics, it is important to understand the nature of chromatin and the role of chromocenters in chromatin organization and genome expression. This article reviews, through the nucleolar participation in ribosome biosynthesis, the known role of chromocenters in the transcriptional regulation of many important genes. Experimental data, for example from nuclei of transplanted tumors and cells of xenografts, are used 0cc13bf012
