TIME: 03. 21 20: 54 - 12.The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday declined to hear an appeal from a private medical practice that refused to perform abortions at a facility in New Mexico. The high court issued an order saying the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals in Washington "erred" in upholding a nationwide injunction blocking the clinic's ability to perform abortions. The clinic, called the Women's Health Center of New Mexico, asked the Supreme Court to decide the issue under the law, not the Constitution, a move legal analysts say would be a procedural decision. It could allow the full court to hear the case and overturn the lower court ruling. New Mexico's attorney general had sued the clinic and the abortion doctor who owns it on behalf of the state's Reproductive Health Services. The clinic's lawyers had argued that the state lacked standing to sue because it has no direct regulation of abortion. The suit argued that state law regulates whether doctors can perform abortions, so it could be argued that the state is the only one with standing to sue. The court's order Monday was similar to one issued in January as an appellate court fought over whether a woman's abortions should be required to take place at clinics and hospitals. The Supreme Court then required clinics to give women the option to have abortions elsewhere instead. The high court could eventually rule on the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals' decision in Whole Woman's Health v. Hellerstedt. The case has drawn intense scrutiny to a 2016 Texas law that requires
