The key here is the -order/-o (changing the sort order). Impact of patient characteristics on the management of gastroesophageal reflux disease. Little is known about how gastroesophageal reflux disease (GERD) patients are managed at the end of the acute care setting. The aim of this study was to characterize the clinical characteristics and management of patients who are discharged with or without prescription for acid-suppressive medication. We conducted a cross-sectional telephone survey of elderly outpatients of primary care physicians who were members of a New York City health plan. Among a total of 448 patients surveyed, 141 (31%) had been prescribed an acid-suppressive medication at the end of the acute care setting. This rate was highly variable, ranging from 17 to 85%, among the office-based practices. An anti-H(2) antagonist was the most common medication prescribed at discharge (61%), and higher rates of prescription of medications were associated with more severe symptoms. Prescription rates were strongly related to the number of physician visits in the preceding year (P or =1 visit in the previous year were more likely to have received a prescription for an acid-suppressive medication (OR=2.78; P=0.027). Patients with concurrent mental illness were less likely to receive a prescription for an acid-suppressive medication (OR=0.34; P=0.003). Gastroesophageal reflux disease patients are not universally prescribed an acid-suppressive medication at the end of the acute care setting. Patients with more intense symptoms are more likely to receive a prescription for acid-suppressive medications.
